In Engaging Ideas, John C. Bean breaks literature review into three types, divisible by purpose. It may be useful to have a discussion with your students about the different types and purposes of literature reviews and then ask them to determine which type (or types) would be appropriate for your assignment and why. 1) Bean suggests that some literature reviews work to "establish a controversy." In these reviews, "[t]he writer typically summarizes scholarly works that take competing points of view on a disciplinary problem and then stakes out a claim that supports one side in the controversy (but adds something new), takes a synthesis position, or reframes the debate." 2) The second type of literature review works to establish the "state of the art." The writer's goal in these reviews, Bean writes, "is to determine the current best thinking of experts on an issue or question, often as part of a proposal to solve a problem. In this role, the writer researches cutting-edge knowledge on some contemporary problem and then reports what the experts currently think." 3) The final type of literature review established a "gap in knowledge." In this review, Bean argues, the writer "shows what is known and is not known about an empirical problem, often as part of the introduction to a scientific paper or grant proposal aimed at filling the gap through new research" (Engaging Ideas, Chapter 13).
